

Survey of early modern theories of temporal experience and spatial awareness

An examination of the attempts made by Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley, Hume, Condillac, and Reid to account for our experience of the passage of time and our awareness of objects placed at a distance -- not only at a distance outward from ourselves but also at a lateral distance from one another. Both original texts and recent commentaries on those texts will be considered.

L. Falkenstein

Winter Term 2018